suffering, as all mental tribulation is more severe than more bodily pain. If anyone who is assailed by a miscreant in quest of "bush-money" were at once to place the matter in the hands of some respectable solicitor, a course of misery would be avoided, as any attempt to extort money through threats or otherwise comes clearly within the provisions of the Act above mentioned; and criminal proceedings will be found the most effectual means for exterminating an entire social pest.—Traveller's Journal.

door than men and children jumped forward and smothered in the paper window to see her. They said that was a Rajagan custom, not Mohammedan. Then the women shut the inner wooden shutters, while they should re attire the bride. The veil was removed, her wedding clothes were put on and her hair covered with ornaments. Then the shutters were opened and we were taken in to see her. She is supposed not to understand anything that is said to her on her wedding day, but must stand or sit with cast down eyes all day long to be gazed at. We then came home to return in the evening. "At these things, though I have never been able to explain the principle has been associated with his name) is in consequence of the Queen so frequently sending him rare and beautifully bound volumes almost entirely of that flower, thus giving rise to the idea that it was the earl's favourite blossom. In his later years flowers of all sorts and trees—everything, in short, that partook of outdoor life, were cultivated in his garden, and he certainly in some sense lived the life of a recluse at Hughenden; but I think that his sudden withdrawal into private and retirement after his visit to Hatfield in 1830 in no way affected his health, unless it was beneficially. How did he spend his time? Well, never monotonously, I believe. He generally breakfasted about a o'clock, and then he was at his desk till as far as the small plantation at the time being laid out on the borders of the estate. He superintended and took a deep light in watching the progress made from day to day, for he was more than an ordinary connoisseur in trees. No, he didn't go in for cutting them down; he believed in building-up and preserving; no botanist he was, but he was a keen and successful horticulturist. He left that to his son, who was a more than ordinary amateur. He returned to the study and to the work of the pen, and he was a very able writer, read his correspondance, and answered what was important, rarely putting off till the morrow what required seeing to. Did he smoke? Well, in his later years, very rarely; as a young man he was an inveterate smoker. By the way, I can show you a tobacco pipe, which he used as a connoisseur. Here the speaker produced from a bureau a little bag made of some kind of Turkey towel, but similar in pattern to that of a Paisley shawl, and lined inside with kidkin. Attached to this were two long tassels for tying round his waist. The bag, trimmed with fringe, and apparently well worn, was sufficiently attested to the fact that it was his. He then produced a long pipe, and said he had many visitors "No, very few indeed. Some during 1831, and the early days of 1881 a few political friends would drop in, but otherwise his life was hermit-like in its solitude. Yet he was hardly never alone, since in his library he was surrounded by his choicest friends, in whose society he passed the greater portion of the twenty-four hours. His hobby, his chief hobby, was the history of the middle ages, books dealing with the thirteenth and fifteenth centuries were his especial delight. The story of the Venetian Republic he never tired of. What periodical literature did he affect in these latter days? Well, I hardly know. He was never without the Revue des Deux Mondes, and seemed never to vary from that to the deep in that volume. He had hundreds of them. Yes, that was his hobby, lying on the table there came from Hughenden, and any pencil marks you may there are his. There can be no question that as the years go on the earl's wisdom will become more and more an element in the national life. Contrasts are so very much of his favour it would be invidious to say more. This is the end of a very charming life, and you will find it hard during his few last years of life. He had no weaknesses or infirmities, and he was a very good chronicler, unless it was his penchant for pedantry, of which bird he had, as you know, some magnificent specimens. Had he lived I believe we should have had one or two glorious books from his pen, though his sickly health forbade any more. Towards the end of his life he was very hardy of spirit. Towards the end of that, the doctor was called in, and the doctor's opinion is too mournful. The doctors had hoped to the last; but he knew better, and he constantly asked to be informed of his precise condition. It is quite curious that he observed, shortly before he died, listening to one of his physician's reports, "His words are hopeful, but his countenance is that of a disappointed man."

For the last time he was kind and cheerful, and I shall never forget the grateful way in which he invariably referred to his trusty servant Baile, who during the whole of his illness tended him with care that has already received its due acknowledgment of praise."
